

He's a lobbyist

Michael Sununu is not a climate scientist, he is a registered lobbyist and business consultant.

His climate-change-denying column should have identified him as a lobbyist.

As a member of the board of a bank and the New Hampshire Historical Society, he probably could write very interesting articles about banking, investing or the historical society. As a non-climate scientist and lobbyist, he has no business writing opinion articles expressing his opinion about how to analyze climate data.

Perhaps you published him because you want to give equal opportunity to Republicans who want to share their climate change opinions? Why not invite an op-ed article on climate change from Republicans who have legitimate credentials in climate science and economics? For example, perhaps meteorology professor Kerry Emanuel would write an op-ed correcting all the errors in Sununu's article? Or perhaps Harvard economics professor Greg Mankiw could explain to your readers why a carbon tax is the best option to fight climate change.

I guarantee Mankiw (adviser to President George W. Bush and candidate Mitt Romney) won't offer wrong opinions about climate data.

JUDY WEISS

Brookline, Mass.

<http://www.concordmonitor.com/home/12919832-95/climate-change-column-stirs-up-a-storm-of-reaction-from-readers>