

Rep. Kelly urged to join House climate caucus

I loved Mike Bleech's column, "Don't be too sure on climate change," especially his conclusion: "Ask yourself what can it hurt if we urge the powers that be to take reasonable measures to prevent climate change? If it does prevent global catastrophe, wow, we sure did the right thing. If all it accomplishes is making the air cleaner, hey, we still did the right thing."

Amen to reasonable prudence.

Readers should ask U.S. Rep. Mike Kelly, R-3rd Dist., to talk with members of the bipartisan House Climate Solutions Caucus about joining the group of 23 Republicans and 23 Democrats. Three Republican representatives from Pennsylvania already participate in the caucus. Why isn't Kelly in it?

Wouldn't you want him to talk with congressional colleagues about reasonable measures to prevent possible, although uncertain, global catastrophe, while having cleaner air as a certain benefit?

— Rabbi Judy Weiss, Brookline, Massachusetts

LINK