

Weather concerns from a different perspective

Editor:

I enjoyed reading Tom Clyde's article about your strangely warm un-snowy winter that sent him out hiking and biking instead of skiing. I'm stuck indoors due to too much snow. In Boston, the city and state have declared a weather emergency, our third in three weeks. Non-essential workers were asked to stay home again tomorrow. School will be closed again for two days. We have three feet of snow on the ground from the last two storms and we're getting two more feet tonight and tomorrow.

We all know by now that the weird weather you're seeing, and the unusually heavy snowfall that we are experiencing, are linked to global warming, which is in turn caused by carbon emissions from fossil fuels.

I urge readers to contact your local chapters of Citizens' Climate Lobby to find out more about global warming solutions that will lower emissions quickly, improve health and save lives, while creating jobs.
